AT A GLANCE

Overview

The Cumulus Personal Line of Credit is an unsecured revolving line that sits alongside your Cumulus Checking account. During a 10-year draw period you can advance funds, repay, and advance again — paying interest only on the outstanding balance. It is designed for clients who want a reliable source of lower-cost financing for short-to-medium-term needs: covering an uneven cash flow month, bridging the sale of an asset, or supplementing an emergency fund.

COMMON QUESTIONS

Frequently asked questions

How is this different from a credit card?

Both are revolving credit. A Personal Line of Credit typically carries a substantially lower APR (13%–23% vs. 20%–29% on many cards), is intended for larger one-time or periodic draws, and does not provide rewards, purchase protection, or merchant-accepted point-of-sale payment. Cards remain ideal for everyday purchases.

When does my APR change?

Your APR adjusts on the first day of each billing cycle that follows a change in the Prime Rate. Cumulus discloses any rate change on that cycle's periodic statement under Regulation Z.

Is there a minimum draw?

Yes, $100 per draw. There is no minimum for aggregate monthly activity and no requirement to draw at all.

Can I use this for overdraft protection?

Yes. You can designate the line as an overdraft source for your Cumulus Checking account. No transfer fee; advances accrue interest from the date of advance.

What happens at the end of year 10?

Any outstanding balance at the end of the draw period converts to a 10-year, fully amortizing installment loan. You cannot draw further. The monthly payment becomes principal + interest rather than interest-only.
